

RINGLEMERE 2003

In March 2003 archaeologists returned to Ringlemere, near Sandwich, to continue excavations at the site where the spectacular early Bronze Age gold cup was discovered in November 2001. This year's programme was again possible through the generosity of the landowners, the Smith brothers of Ringlemere Farm. The work was funded by substantial grants from the KAS, the BBC and the British Museum. Progress of the excavation was filmed throughout by a professional team from the BBC (fig. 1) and this should be screened, as part of the new 'Hidden Treasures' series, sometime during September.

The excavations were headed by members of Canterbury Archaeological Trust but the bulk of the digging was undertaken by a team from the Dover Archaeological Group, assisted by members from Thanet, Lenham, Maidstone and Otford Archaeological Societies, as well as a number of other volunteers. The entire operation served as a splendid example of what can be achieved by amateurs and professionals working in close co-operation and should serve as a model for other projects being undertaken in the County.

The main aim of this year's investigation was to re-examine the central part of the round barrow previously identified and to try and determine the exact diameter of its enclosing ditch. The great ditch was located in roughly its expected position and the overall diameter of the enclosed area can now be confirmed as being 41.50 metres (136 feet). Excavation of the ditch revealed that it was over 2 metres (6 feet) deep and in times of wet weather had sometimes held water. The ditch seems to have been completely silted and invisible by the Roman period.

Many centuries of ploughing have removed all but the base of the barrow mound; originally it might have stood to a height of around 5 metres (16 feet). Such dimensions would have made the barrow one of the very largest in southern Britain.

Survival of the mound had served to trap evidence of earlier activity below and it can now be seen that a major late Neolithic settlement had existed on the site of the barrow around 700-1000 years earlier. The inhabitants of this settlement used highly decorated Grooved ware pottery and the assemblage of such pottery from Ringlemere is now by far the largest from Kent and one of the largest from anywhere in south-east England. Whether this coincidence of location is purely fortuitous remains to be considered in the light of further excavation but some sort of link presently seems possible.

In order to set the site into its local context, field-walking and metal-detecting of the adjacent field was undertaken, in search of evidence for any settlement associated with the barrow. This has confirmed that a spread of prehistoric struck flints and calcined flints occurs across the entire area. Metal-detector surveys have also revealed a light scatter of Roman coins but the most significant discovery was a rare early Iron Age brooch probably imported from France (fig. 2). This represents an important new find for Kent but belongs to a period not previously represented at Ringlemere.

As part of the TV programme, some experimental archaeology was undertaken. In an attempt to ascertain the possible uses of the numerous calcined flints ('pot-boilers') which occur in large numbers across the site, fish and meat were cooked in a pit using heated flints. The resulting cooked food was entirely edible and the waste material left-over consisted of calcined flints identical to those found in the Ringlemere excavations and on many other prehistoric sites in Kent. Details of this interesting experiment will be written up in due course. NB:- the calcined flints from the experiment were carefully removed from the site in order not to contaminate the area and bias the results of any future field-walking exercise.

Ploughing continues to erode the Ringlemere barrow and it is intended to fully excavate the complete monument over the course of the next few years. Hopefully, we will also be looking at some of the other, smaller barrow sites known from crop-marks in the same field. The field-walking too will be continued as the crop rotation allows. The general impression is that the entire Ringlemere area has a very high archaeological potential and more important discoveries are anticipated.

Anyone wishing to assist in the September excavations should contact the writer.

NEW DISPLAYS AT FAVERSHAM MUSEUM

Housed within the Fleur de Lis Heritage Centre, Faversham's Museum has recently been updated to include several new displays. Visitors begin their visit by seeing what archaeology has revealed, from the earliest Iron Age beginnings of the area through to Faversham's development in the medieval period, particularly the role played by its two monasteries, Faversham Abbey and Davington Priory.

This is followed by the new Elizabethan Room, illustrating the rise in prosperity of the town after the Dissolution. The development of the explosives industry is traced in a specially-commissioned video.

Upstairs is a Victorian Schoolroom and a late Victorian kitchen, as authentic as possible in style, with a selection of Victorian 'entertainment' such as lantern-slide shows and wind-up gramophones also on display.

Both World Wars are remembered, with memorabilia from the work of 'Dad's Army' and the Air Raid Wardens. A hand-operated air raid siren sits silently nearby - too incredibly noisy to operate!

The town's civic and ceremonial life and sporting scene are also shown. The virtually extinct local sports of goal running and rink hockey take pride of place.

Finally comes the 'shopping centre'. "Not exactly Bluewater" says John Culmer, Senior Honorary Curator, "but a vivid evocation of how High Street shops used to be in our grand, or great-grandparents, day". A barber's, a chemist's, a sweet shop, a sub-post office and lending library, and a drapers' are all recreated in period style with almost everything on show being authentic.

Displays on Faversham's other industries, such as brewing and brick-making, are planned when finance for upgrading the available space is found. Pride of place will surely go to an old fashioned electro-mechanical (Strowger) automatic telephone exchange, of which there are only two or three left in the country. Engineers will install lines around the Fleur de Lis complex and visitors will be able to call each other on old-fashioned phones. There is even an old telephone kiosk with a 'Press Buttons A and B' mechanism, complete with a stock of old pennies for its use.

The repatriation and restoration of a beautiful Georgian Faversham shopfront which had found its way to a Chicago Museum 75 years ago, will lead to eventual display in front of a garden laid out in formal Georgian style.

The Museum is open from 10am to 4pm on Monday to Saturdays and from 10am to 1pm on Sundays with an admission charge of £2 (concessions £1).

Top left: The centre's attractive frontage and above, two of the display areas: the late Victorian kitchen and Wartime display.

TIME TEAM COMES TO FAVERSHAM

Over 60 people from Time Team descended on Syndale recently to explore and film recent discoveries. Paul Wilkinson's theory was that there was evidence of a Roman fort from the Claudian invasion of Britain buried under the 18th century estate at Syndale, just to the west of Faversham. They were not disappointed, and discoveries were made which can be seen when the programme is aired in January 2004. A dig is currently underway to build on Time Team's discoveries, ending August 3rd. To participate phone 01795 532548; cost £35 per day or £25 for members of Kent Archaeological Field School.

COURSES

Certificate in the Theory and Practice of Local History at the University of Kent

Students who register for the Certificate in the Theory and Practice of Local History are introduced to both the ways that local history is written and how to do it themselves, through a wide range of modules which also provide opportunities for:

- * working with original sources
- * field work
- * pursuing individual interests (within particular topics such as family, oral or maritime history)

The certificate is a two year programme which runs at Canterbury, Tonbridge and Chatham and the only qualifications required are enthusiasm and an interest in local history. On successful completion of the certificate students may progress to the next stage of either the part-time or full-time degree programme.

Further information from the Programme Director, Dr Elizabeth Edwards (01227 827859, email: E.C.Edwards@ukc.ac.uk) or visit the School of History website: www.ukc.ac.uk/history/

OTHER EVENTS

Sheppey Local History Society ~ Heritage Walks in Sheerness, Minster and Queenborough.

Available to groups and at various advertised times to the general public. Leisurely strolls of two hours or so, focussing on the history and development of the area and stories of the inhabitants. Problems of conservation are examined.

The next public walks, organized as part of the Swale Festival period are:

Sunday 20th July & Sunday 27th July, Minster - on-Sea

2pm from Minster Gatehouse Museum: bus from Sheerness station connects. £1.50 including light refreshments and museum admission.

Wednesday 23rd July, Blue Town area of Sheerness

2pm from Sheerness station. £4.25 including afternoon tea.

Thursday 24th July, Seaford, Sheerness

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

An innovation at the A.G.M. was a report on the work of the Fieldwork Committee. Its chairman, Chris Pout, used a Powerpoint presentation and concentrated on the Society's equipment which is available for members to borrow (after training) and the last season's excavations at the Roman villa at Minster in Thanet.

The meeting took place at the Angel Centre in Tonbridge and there were over 50 members present. Before and after the meeting they were able to look at displays by the Centre for Kentish Studies and some local societies and stalls selling books.

The elections to the Council saw Chris Pout elected as a new member and the retirement of two long-serving members, Alec Miles and Ray Rolinson. There was no change to the other Council members and officers.

In the afternoon Dr Derek

Renn spoke on New Light on Kent Castles. He put forward some aspects of castles in and around Kent that are not always considered such as displaying their owners' status as well as dominating their communities.

ROVING REPORTER

I still require more 'roving reporters' to inform the Newsletter of events within your area which might be of interest to other KAS members. Areas now covered are Tonbridge, Rochester, Sittingbourne, Sevenoaks & Otford - thank you to those who responded to my previous request. Being geographically distant from my base, the east of the county in particular would benefit from someone who could keep an eye on local libraries, museums, clubs and similar, to find out about exhibitions, talks or other 'happenings'. My contact details are on the back page and I would be pleased to hear from anyone that can help.

MEMBERSHIP MATTERS

Please send all matters concerning membership, including changes of addresses, to me and not to Mrs Lawrence!

If you renew your subscription later than June you are not entitled to the current year's copy of Archaeologia Cantiana unless you send an additional £5.

Remember to take your membership card with you to the KAS Library as this is essential if you wish to use it. If you have mislaid the card please send your request to me for a replacement, with a stamped addressed envelope.

All correspondence relating to membership to - Mrs Shiela Broomfield, KAS Membership, 8 Woodview Crescent, Hildenborough, Tonbridge, TN11 9HD tel: 01732 838698 email: membership@kentarchaeology.org.uk or s.broomfield@dial.pipex.com.

ALLEN GROVE LOCAL HISTORY FUND

The Fund made five grants this year totalling £1,050.

These were made to Mrs M J Chapman for research into the lives of men and women of Loose who gave their lives in the two world wars, Mr J Owen for a history and guide of Throwley Church, Mr G Pike for publication of a book Whitstable: History at the Horsebridge, Mrs M M Scott for printing a second instalment of the Leeds Millennium Project on the history of houses in the village, and Mr D C Viceroy-Weekes for printing a book on All Saints Church, Fooks Cray.

The next grants will be made in about June next year.

Application forms for grants can be obtained from the Hon. General Secretary and the applications must reach him by 31st March. The trustees will be willing to consider suggestions for projects which could be commissioned by the Society and funded by grants from the Fund.

ABBEY FARM EXCAVATION

Enrolment for the first week of the excavation by the KAS and the Trust for Thanet Archaeology at Minster (24th - 30th August) is almost full. There are still some places left for the second week (31st August - 6th September) but prompt booking is advised. Fee for KAS or Thanet Archaeological Society members is £25 for one week or £40 for two weeks, non-members £35 and £50 respectively.

To enrol please contact David Bacchus, Telford Lodge, Roebuck Road, Rochester ME1 1UD tel: 01634 843495 email: d_bacchus@talk21.com

KAS COMMITTEE ROUND-UP

Publications Committee

There are at present eighteen members on the Committee. Good progress is being made in preparing an Historical Atlas of Kent, which promises to be a fine publication. The next volume of Archaeologia Cantiana is well on schedule.

Jointly with the Kent History Federation the Committee administers the Kent History Fund, awarding grants to support historical research and publication. During 2002 seven grants were awarded totalling £2,150. Recently it has been resolved that applications can be submitted and considered at any time within a year, provided that the total sum allocated by the Council is not exceeded for that year. £2000 has been allocated for 2003. Details concerning applications appear in the Newsletter.

Fieldwork Committee.

Excavation.

Fremfords Site Maidstone: development here has already revealed Roman features; inhumation burials and post-medieval buildings. The site is being excavated by the A.O.C. unit.

Margate Football Ground: the rebuilding of the stadium has exposed a ditch containing bone, shell and Iron-Age pottery. The site is being excavated by the Trust for Thanet Archaeology.

Dartford Priory Site: earth works here have revealed walls that were once part of the priory. The site is being excavated by the Wessex Archaeological Unit.

Young Archaeologists: the North Downs Group have carried out excavation work on a windmill site at Stelling Minnis. The project was done in conjunction with the K.C.C.

Recording.

The Kent Underground Research Group are recording tunnels at Snargate Street, Dover. Their project at Chislehurst Caves is on going.

Metal Detecting.

The southern region of the National Council for Metal Detecting have set up a support unit in Kent. The unit when requested will work with archaeological groups and member clubs of the NCMD SR.

Churches Committee

The Churches Committee welcomed some fifty people on the Spring visit to Hoo Allhallows and St.Margaret's High Halstow - both likely to be affected by any future Cliffe Airport.

The data bank being built up of all places of worship in the county still requires input from a number of areas. Information should be addressed to the Hon. Sec. KAS Churches Committee, The Library, Maidstone Museum, St.Faith's Street, Maidstone, ME 14 1LH.

Local churches continue to benefit from our advice on guidebook planning and interpretation of architecture. The 'Ideas and Ideals' series pursues its way into the 17th century in the current edition.

Philip Lawrence (Chair)

Membership Committee

Thirty members joined together for the Spring Social event to Great Chart Church and Godinton House near Ashford. The pleasure of Godinton House even surpassed the pleasure of unusual summer sunshine. The superb example of the Toke family's medieval hall house and its later development was greatly appreciated.

Margaret Lawrence (Sec)

Education Committee

Ian Coulson was appointed new Chair to the Education Committee. Ian has extensive experience working in the education field, in particular as schools Lead History Advisor for the Kent Advisory Service at Kent County Council. The Committee agreed a grant of £5000 towards the work of Canterbury Archaeological Trust's Education Service for the current year. A further grant of £200 was given to the North Downs Young Archaeologists Club to stage a National Archaeology Day Event in July at the Museum of Kent Life.

'IDEAS and IDEALS'

This is the seventh of a series of articles describing formative movements and ideas in the history of the church. These were the crises of thought and conviction which brought us to where we are.

BAPTISTS, INDEPENDENTS AND SEPARATION FROM THE STATE IN KENT

In 313 Constantine issued the Edict of Milan which gave Christianity full legal equality.¹ However in 380 an edict decreed that "all the peoples" of the empire should "practice...the Christian religion". This move created a structure that would quickly depart from its original purity, a church beholden to the state. From that day to this groups of Christians have sought to return to New Testament simplicity and purity. Often they have had to do this in the teeth of opposition from the official faith of the state in which they lived.

In Medieval England the first defined group to be dissatisfied with the established order of a state enforced faith were the followers of John Wycliffe. Known as Lollards, they emphasised the need for people to read the Bible in the vernacular and the need for personal religion. They were particularly numerous in the Weald of Kent with a very strong following for several generations in Tenterden. Their doctrines found expression in other later dissident voices and groups.

On the continent in the wake of the reformation arose a more radical movement called Anabaptism. This taught separation of the Church and State and drew fierce opposition with the result that many fled to England. As Henry Dosker states, 'in the turbulent times of the great persecution in the Lowlands, refugees by the thousand left Holland for the harbour of refuge in the great island kingdom.'² Anabaptists found in England kindred spirits among Lollard communities and Kent was regarded as a hot bed of activity, so much so that in 1547 Bishops were appointed to deal with them.³ Joan of Kent was the most well known radical who was condemned to be burned at the stake in 1550. The Elizabethan Settlement in England brought little relief for those who disagreed with the status quo. Those who separated themselves from the Church of England were labelled as Brownists after Robert Browne (1550-1633), the father of Congregationalism. He taught that authority was to be given to each congregation to govern themselves as independent religious bodies, with each individual congregation electing and supporting its own ministry. From these congregations came the Pilgrim Fathers.

James I on his accession would allow no changes and stated "he would have them conform or hary them out of the land". Dissent was harshly suppressed resulting in many arrests and the exile of whole congregations to Holland and then America.⁴ John Lothrop, the Curate of Egerton, left there in 1623, to join London's oldest independent congregation. In 1632, as he met for worship in Blackfriars, Laud's warrant officer broke in and arrested 42 people; John was held until he agreed to go into exile and so in 1635 Lothrop with thirty-four of his friends landed at Scituate Mass. Within weeks many more sympathisers arrived from Kent,⁵ so that the main thoroughfare of the settlement was named Kent Street.⁶

The most numerous dissenters in Kent however were to be the Baptists. A group of English exiles in Amsterdam formed a church under the leadership of John Smyth (c.1554 - 1612) and Thomas Helwys. In 1611 Helwys led the group back to England, and wrote The Mystery of Iniquity, the first English printed book to plead for full religious freedom. In this he argued for freedom of religion for all, specifically including in this Islamic, Judaic, and atheistic belief. W S Wyles in his Fragment of Baptist History suggested that there had been a meeting of Anabaptists at Smarden before 1603, but it is more likely that this was a Lollard meeting. Eythorne in East Kent had a meeting at an early date but was not officially organised as a Baptist meeting until the late 17th century.

Nonconformity flourished during the Commonwealth period, especially so in Kent after 1653 when Baptist evangelists came from London. The Smarden Baptist church is the counties oldest with records dating from its inception. This church began through an unusual chain of circumstances. The Vicar of Marden, Francis Cornwell, had spent time in Maidstone jail for nonconformity and during this time accepted Baptist beliefs and was baptised by immersion at the hands of William Jeffrey, an active General Baptist preacher who was responsible for planting over twenty churches in Kent.⁷ When Cornwell was released in 1644, he was appointed to preach a visitation sermon in the parish church at Cranbrook. He boldly took the opportunity to expound his new views of the church and preached from Mark 7:7. 'They worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.' Such outspokenness caused an outcry followed by a public debate. Christopher Blackwood, the Curate of Rye [1606 - 1670] was present and he calmed the tumult promising to answer these arguments at an open public meeting. However, he himself became convinced Cornwell was right.

Blackwood's studies were printed in 1644 as The Storming of Anti-Christ Of Compulsion of Conscience and Infants' Baptism.⁸ This little book was primarily a powerful plea for liberty of conscience to worship God according to ones own personal convictions. The other half of the book was a powerful array of the arguments against the practice of peodobaptism. Blackwood wrote that 'infant baptism upholds a national church, for it is hereby that all nations become (pseudo Christians many of them) Christians, not from any national multiplication of disciples.'⁹ Blackwood argued powerfully against the evil of persecution and showed that the Old Testament is not a pattern for the relationship between state and church. He believed that 'the godly may rest their cause confidently in the vast power of God's truth',¹⁰ and 'that even as we do not cut off persons infected with pox, leprosy or pestilence, neither should the magistrate cut off heretics. It is not possible for God's elect to be deceived but it is possible for heretics to be converted.'¹¹ Blackwood accepted that absolute freedom should be permitted to all, provided they did not endanger the state or violate civil peace. Even Catholics he bravely advocated should be at complete liberty until such times as they threaten the stability of the state. These were radical views and far ahead of their time. Blackwood was baptised by Jeffrey along with Richard Kingsnorth and with others who then began to meet in Kingsnorth's house, named Spillshill near Staplehurst. In 1640/44 over 80 people met and covenanted together to constitute a church after the New Testament pattern. This pioneer group met in Spillshill until 1677, by which time they had meetings all around the Weald and a membership drawn from over thirty parishes.

Months in advance of Charles II arrival on these shores, four Baptist leaders in Kent - Jeffrey and Reeve of Sevenoaks with Hammon and Blackmore of Biddenden - were in Maidstone jail from where they published a tract in 1660 entitled 'A Humble Petition of several innocent subjects called Anabaptists now prisoners in Maidstone jail ... together with an acknowledgement of the kings authority in civil things ... with their reasons meriting the King's protection in their civil and spiritual rights.' They expressed their hopes that Charles would keep to his promise given at Breda when he declared he 'would give liberty to tender consciences, and that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion'¹². This plea and another by the main Baptist body was ignored and thirty-five years of hardship and persecution lay ahead for all nonconformists.

Complete religious toleration was viewed as a threat to the stability of the state by the establishment of the day. In the words of W. K. Jordan, a leading authority - *They held as a matter of principle that the State and Church must be completely disassociated. They required no assistance from the civil magistrate in the formation of their church or in the maintenance of its discipline and hence could view with equanimity any political order, which invested them with religious freedom. They found in the Cromwellian settlement of religion a large measure of freedom and accordingly were inclined to support the civil government with all the means at their disposal.*¹³

Very soon fines, restraint and imprisonment were being meted out liberally to those who held unauthorised meetings. Firstly the Corporation Act of 1661 prevented any Nonconformist from holding office in any municipal body, and then the Act of Uniformity of 1662 forbade all gatherings for worship which did not conform to the new prayer book. Then the Conventicle Act of 1664 forbade more than five persons other than the family to meet for worship, the penalties being £20 each on the preacher and household-er, 5/- on each hearer with half to go to the informer. In 1670 the penalties were stiffened and included transportation. The Test Act of 1673 was the final injustice and denied all employment, civil, naval or military under the government to Nonconformists. It was not until 1812 that the limited Toleration Act of 1689 was extended and finally in 1828 the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed. Full access to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge did not come until 1871. The 'meeters' often had to pay the fines for others who could not pay for themselves. Warrants of distress were granted to informers, to levy the amount on the possessions of the accused; and the constables were charged to relieve the 'meeters' of property to three times the value of the fine. Shops were plundered, homes were stripped and cattle were driven off their owners' lands to satisfy these disgraceful laws.¹⁴

Little is recorded of how our Kentish people fared, but we do know an attempt was made to arrest George Hammon, the pastor of the Biddenden meeting. On his way to take a meeting, he was caught in a storm. As he sheltered under a tree, a stranger from a nearby house called out saying 'I hear there is to be a meeting nearby and I am an informer' George replied, 'I am a man taker also, will you come with me to the same place?' So they walked together to the assembled gathering and waited. Whereupon George said to the spy 'There is no minister, so it cannot be a conventicle unless someone preaches, so let you or I preach.' The spy declining, Hammon to his great surprise spoke with such power and effect that the informer became a changed man.¹⁵ The minister of Eythorne, John Knott, had his goods seized and offered for public sale but he was so well respected nobody would bid for his property.¹⁶ In 1672 an indulgence was granted and many men took the opportunity to license their homes or those of their supporters for preaching. Fifty-three licences were granted in Kent but this relief was short lived and within the year persecution was renewed. In 1676 Smarden alone had one hundred nonconformists and this shows that persecution did little to change their views.

The coming of William and Mary was a welcome relief to all nonconformists. Parliament speedily passed The Toleration Act of 1689, which was the first statutory grant of religious toleration in England and extended religious liberties to Catholic and Protestant alike, ending the Church of England's monopoly of the nation's religious life. At long last the State recognised the right of Nonconformists to have their own preachers and places of worship. Thus dawned a new day that many previous generations of dissenters had longed to see. Their faith in God and the strength of their convictions are cause for thankfulness. Today we enjoy liberty of conscience hard won for us by these folk. For generations they were an underground church suffering fines, imprisonment and even martyrdom. We are deeply in their debt.

THE CIVIC TRUST
OPEN DAYS

Established in 1994, this event is England's contribution to European Heritage Days, in which 48 countries take part. Celebrating England's architecture and culture, these Open Days allow visitors free access to interesting, and often curious, properties that are normally either closed or charge entrance. Tours, events and activities focussing on local architecture and culture also take place. Organised by volunteers for local people, and with support and funding from English Heritage, the Open Days attract some 800,000 visitors each year.

From tunnels to temples and follies to factories, the variety of places is endless - churches, industrial sites, castles, windmills, town halls, offices, and contemporary buildings all figure in the list of open properties.

The event directory, listing all participating properties, appears this month - log onto www.heritageopendays.org.uk to discover a venue near you or ring 020 7930 0914 or write to The Civic Trust, 17

HOLLINGBOURNE HOARD

May I respond to the letter from the Chairman of the Lenham Archaeological Society in the Spring Newsletter? In brief, while people in AD 43 could have known Bronze Age objects, the Hollingbourne hoard had probably been in the ground for nearly a thousand years by then.

To take her last point first, I too hope the hoard can be carbon-dated. A recent programme of radiocarbon dating for Bronze Age metalwork – including wood from sockets – has shown that material from the Carp's Tongue phase was in use around 1000-800 BC. Some writers have proposed that hoards like Hollingbourne were deposited around 800 BC because bronze went out of use then. There is indeed very little metalwork of the succeeding Llyn Fawr phase in Kent, but elsewhere in southern England bronze hoards continued to be deposited until about 600 BC. However, we cannot be sure that all the numerous Carp's Tongue hoards were deposited at the end of the period and other factors were probably influential in the transition from bronze to iron.

Sometimes Bronze Age types were deposited even later, notably in the so-called Salisbury hoard probably buried around 200 BC. We also think miniature versions of bronze socketed axes were made during the Iron Age and the Roman period. This indicates that Iron Age people knew Bronze Age metalwork, perhaps because they uncovered old hoards as we do today or perhaps because some Bronze Age objects were preserved through later centuries, but I understand that metal detector surveys revealed no Iron Age finds at Hollingbourne.

Whether any of the axes from Hollingbourne were perfectly good when they were deposited, the hoard certainly contains small fragments of axes and other objects. While it does include copper ingot fragments, the product of smelting copper ore, the hoard does not appear to contain debris from casting of new bronze objects and I understand that there was no evidence of a furnace on the site. This suggests Hollingbourne is better described as a scrap hoard than as a founder's hoard. Whatever the interpretation of the metalwork before it was deposited, the significance of its deposition may not necessarily have reflected the function of its contents before they were buried. Hoards on dry land might have been deposited to demonstrate the wealth and prestige of the people who buried them, or for some other reason of the kind archaeologists usually call 'ritual'.

I cannot easily calculate how many socketed axes are known from Kent, but a published corpus for Scotland and northern England contains over 700 and southern England is much richer. So while we are rightly impressed by the skill of Bronze Age craftsmen, axes were probably very common objects at the time as the all-purpose woodworking tool to which most adults must have required access. Bronze must have indeed been valuable, so hoards were not necessarily lost or forgotten. Of course some hoards might have been hidden for later retrieval that never took place, but they were probably a minority. We know from finds of bronzes, notably swords, from rivers – including the Medway, that fine metalwork was deposited in circumstances that must have been deliberate: Francis Pryor's brilliant excavations have revealed how bronzes were thrown into the water from a causeway linking Flag Fen platform with dry land at Fengate. The point is that people knew very well where those bronzes were being deposited, though it would have been impossible to recover them. The same may have applied to some hoards on dry land, where law or convention might have strongly discouraged other people from digging them up again.

Clay Lane Wood, discussed by Paul Ashbee in Newsletter no 48, is an intriguing find. But its bronzes might have been bright simply because they had been deposited in conditions that did not allow extensive corrosion or patina to develop.

Finally, we should congratulate all those involved in recovering the hoard – and welcome the belated introduction in England of antiquities legislation to protect the integrity of such finds. Our understanding of Bronze Age metalwork and its deposition can be improved only by study of the material and its context. The starting point for this must be publication, so I hope that – unlike most hoards from Kent – Hollingbourne will be fully and promptly published. Perhaps the KAS will assist?

KENT CHURCHES SURVEYS

I must correct the impression given by Alan Ward at the K.A.S. Day Conference, 'Church and Monastery in Anglo-Saxon and Medieval Times' held on 26th April 2003. He seemed to be suggesting that there are no archaeological surveys of churches currently being undertaken in Kent. Much excellent work was done by Tim Tatton-Brown for the Dioceses of Canterbury and Rochester in the 1990s – copies of all his surveys are in the Canterbury Archaeological Trust's library. Tim's work has been carried on since 2000 by Hugh Richmond, M.A., Dip. Arch. (Cantab), F.S.A., an Historic Buildings Consultant who was previously Director of Architectural Survey for the Royal Commission on the Historical Monuments of England.

Hugh surveyed twenty churches in 2002, and a further twenty are planned for this year. His reports, which include phased building plans, form part of the Sites and Monuments Record maintained by K.C.C. Indeed, K.C.C. was one of the original sponsors of the project, as were the two Diocese and other interested bodies, including the K.A.S. and I am glad to have the opportunity to publicly thank the Churches Committee in particular for their recent donation towards the costs of the Survey.

So far we have surveyed almost 50% of Kent churches listed Grade II* or higher, a total of 160, and there are plans to make the results widely accessible through a website. Again K.A.S. funding is enabling us to embark on a pilot study of how this can best be achieved. However, longer term funding for the surveys themselves is not yet in place and the future is uncertain. Nevertheless, I cannot agree with Alan Ward's view that most amateur archaeologists could take part in this type of recording work, albeit under professional guidance. While this may be true of ruined churches such as Stone next Faversham and Hope, the recording and, more importantly, the interpretation of standing fabric is an entirely different matter. This requires specialist knowledge of church architecture, including a detailed appreciation of style and the development of form. It is also essential to have an understanding of changes in liturgical practice and the way in which church interiors have been adapted and changed to accommodate them. In practice this requires knowledge of the whole range of furniture and other artefacts, of all periods, that survive in churches, and the ability to place them in a meaningful context.

One thing is certain. There must be effective coordination to avoid duplication of effort. A committee, comprising representatives of the two Kent dioceses, English Heritage and K.C.C., already exists to plan and oversee the survey work. The secretary, Mr Ian Dodd, D.A.C. Secretary, 9 The Precincts, Canterbury CT1 2EE will be pleased to help with any enquiries.

VICTORIAN ART IN A MEDIEVAL CHURCH

Restoration of rare Victorian wall paintings was cause for celebration in May at the little North Downs church of SS Peter & Paul in Luddesdown. This unique collection of Pre-Raphaelite church art is an unusual survival of high quality when so many of its contemporaries have fallen victim to fire, obliterating whitewash and aesthetic disapproval.

The 13th/14th century church had suffered serious fabric damage in 1865 with a roof fall, but initial plans to rebuild it as a 19th century church were eventually modified to restore the church substantially, incorporating most of the original fabric in situ.

The decoration began in 1870, when a triple lancet east window with seven panels depicting the life of Christ replaced a single lancet. Three years later a single lancet was added to the south-east of the chancel. Both were the work of Heaton, Butler and Bayne, leading practitioners of church décor, particularly noted for their stained glass. In the mid-1870's, further decoration was prescribed on an allocation of £830, and Heaton, Butler & Bayne were again contracted for the work. This was begun in the nave, with biblical inscriptions at ceiling height and a dado of sunflowers on a red ground to pew height.

In 1877/8 the west wall was decorated with five cusped arches and floral panels, and a charming grisaille, Children Being Presented to Christ (fig 1), was added to the south wall of the baptistry.

Presentation of the Keys to St Peter and Pentecost.

The survival, in as near as possible to their original condition of a complete church décor, is remarkable, and is probably due in large part to the patronage of the Wigan family. John Alfred Wigan of East Malling acquired the patronage in 1836, installing his son, Alfred, in 1856 as Rector. The family donated the chancel paintings in memory of him. The overall work was initiated by the Reverend Alfred Wigan, and much of the cost was almost certainly met by him. The last member of the family to live in Luddesdown was Miss Eleanor Wigan, who died in the mid 1950's.

floral motifs (fig 2). Tom Organ of the Wallpaintings Workshop, Faversham, gave a slide presentation describing the delicate and sometimes difficult work of restoring the original media, which took five years to complete. Mrs Eiley Bassett, a local historian, had earlier outlined something of the history of the church and the circumstances leading to the decoration.

The last murals to be added were two fine paintings occupying the north wall of the chancel,

The murals show clearly the Pre-Raphaelite influence. During the morning of the first day of a celebratory weekend, Valerie Woodgate, art historian of the Tate Gallery, interpreted some of the religious significance in the paintings, particularly in the

The house in Gillingham looks similar to others nearby – bright with flower baskets and modern. But step inside and time peels away to reveal the trappings of life some 2000 years ago; there are carded fleeces in the broom cupboard, wooden spear poles on the stairwell, metalworking debris in the garden and natural dyes brewing in the kitchen. This house is overflowing with materials and objects used in recreating the lives of the Cantiaci, the Iron Age tribe of Kent.

On their own admission, the occupants, Chris and Joe Toomey, regard their passion for the Iron Age as that of ‘anorak’ status.

The Toomeys, together with associate Carol Wigley, form the management team of the Cantiaci – an appropriate ‘Celtic trio’. Groups such as theirs, dedicating themselves to living-out past lives, can be an easy target for intellectual disparagement; but you have only to listen to Cantiaci’s members talking about La Tène metalwork styles or the survival of Hallstatt salt mine fabrics to appreciate the veracity and depth of their knowledge.

The Cantiaci project has one abiding ethos, that all recreation should be purely on the basis of known archaeological evidence. But authenticity does not extend to fanaticism; ‘reality kicked in when suggestions were made that I wrap my toddlers, as they were then, in fleece, or leave them bare-bottomed – nappies were a must’. In public the group eat only food prepared and cooked in accordance with their ethos of authenticity, although precautions are taken, such as the sterilization of all pottery with a steam gun beforehand. Given that there are many children in the group, some of whom are not over-keen on Iron Age fare, the odd packet of crisps is consumed behind a wattle screen!

The project’s inception arose a decade ago when Joe and Chris were asked to help out at Riverside Country Park with school parties. A month before an advertised event, ‘A Story to Tell’, they were told that this was to be their story, and Cantiaci was born. In September 1993, they became ‘official’, with a small grant from Gillingham Borough Council, despite Riverside’s management giving them only 3 weeks to last.

After consideration of other groups also involved in ‘being’ the past, they knew what they didn’t want it to do. “Re-enactment, often based on conflict of the time, was not for us – it was more of a challenge to research and see how people really lived their everyday lives – to be a living history project”. It was decided to build an Iron Age Village at Riverside. Work began in earnest, but not without some ‘sticky’ moments – “on hot days I’ve nearly dried in the daub pit several times after climbing in to work it well with my feet!” laughs Chris.

The Cantiaci numbered over 40 people by now – many of them family groups. Chris recalls past Cantiaci children, whose involvement with the community experience has shaped their outlook today. “They learnt their parents’ skills, just as in the Iron Age, became ecologically aware and truly were part of an extended ‘tribal’ family”. Decisions have always been made communally, and all personal disputes have to stay firmly within the 21st century.

Each member of the project has a role to play; specialists in textiles, leather, wood, metalwork, basketry and ancient foodstuffs are constantly reworking ideas to uncover the story behind the manufacture and use of artefacts. If possible, Kentish finds are recreated; firedogs are based on those with an auroch’s head in Maidstone Museum. If no local example exists, style and material are based on the nearest available, hence an exact copy of a chain from Danebury supports their cauldron.

The project went from strength to strength. Their professionalism led to TV work and credits include ‘Boudicca’ for Cromwell Films, ‘Tales of the Living Dead’ for Brighton Films (sold to Channel 4 and the Discovery Channel amongst others) and ‘Meet the Ancestors’.

But disaster struck in August 2001. A tiny piece of smouldering grass, caught up in a thermal from a distant fire, landed on the roundhouse roof.

Within 5 minutes everything flammable had disappeared – only metallic artefacts were saved. Grieving for this loss is still apparent in Chris’s eyes when she speaks of the desperate battle to save the house and the sense of helplessness as they watched.

Although a great personal loss to the Cantiaci, the destruction of the roundhouse did provide an opportunity to study what might remain in the archaeological record after a fire; a detailed record was made of burn patterns. The roundhouse has not, however, been rebuilt. Cantiaci’s firm belief that education should be free for all was challenged when the Council wanted to charge admission. The proposition also of an ice cream stand nearby ruled out archaeological authenticity: “We’d be Disney Cantiaci...”.

Having no base now as such, their display is presently a mobile one, and it is hoped to raise enough funds to buy a suitably large vehicle with which to transport most of the group. They have recently invested in a new computer system with which to revamp their website, as public access is so important. Work is progressing on a package to offer within schools; Chris fantasises about a screen-printed instant roundhouse! However, without the tastes, smells, textures, sounds and atmosphere of their previous ‘home’, the Cantiaci feel that children miss out on the total experience they previously offered.

The Cantiaci can be seen on display at The Museum of Kent Life on National Archaeology Day on Sunday 20th July from 11am-4pm.
